Donor 3209 Interview Notes

Donor 3209 is a charming young man, who combines energy and ambition with an easygoing manner. I was impressed by his initiative, drive, and self-confidence. He ran track for eight years, competing in both long distance and sprinting events. After a dispute with his high school track coach (who prevented the donor from participating in a state-wide event because he had been out sick the day before), he was unable to get a track scholarship to a local university. The donor acknowledges that he did not apply himself academically in high school, so he relocated to the SF Bay Area, where he is attending community college with plans to transfer to a university. He is pursuing business studies with the goal of becoming a real estate developer, which is in keeping with an entrepreneurial tradition in his family—his father is a property manager and his paternal grandfather ran salt and shipping businesses in the Bahamas. I was impressed that the donor has established a successful business for himself as a personal trainer. He also works weekends as a sales associate in condominium sales. When I asked him when he ever has any free time, he laughed and said “between classes!” Although he admitted to missing his close high school friends and family back home, he is committed to completing his studies here.

The donor is very close to his family. Both his parents know he is becoming a sperm donor, and they helped him complete his family history. He praised his parents for teaching him values of fairness, dedication, and honesty. He noted that his father is passionate about antidiscrimination in his position as a property manager.

Donor 3209 is extremely good-looking. He is lanky, well built, and graceful in his movements. He is clearly physically gifted. Since he is not currently running track, he has taken up Kung Fu and recently began Samba lessons, both of which offer challenging contrasts to his previous athletic endeavors. He has extraordinarily beautiful blue eyes, which crinkle during his frequent wide and warm smiles.
